Marketing not in university's plans

SJSU doesn't incorporate marketing in their techniques to gain more applicants, as opposed to other colleges that give applicants incentives to apply, said a representative of SJSU admissions.

"CSU doesn't have any type of marketing incentive," said Deanna Gonzales, SJSU Interim Director of SJSU Undergraduate and Graduate admissions.

Gonzales said that SJSU doesn't need to use marketing at this point.

"I don't think there is a need when we're getting out there to high school campuses and college fairs and parents' night for students," she said.

Representing civil rights and equality was a risk that would have caused the ultimate sacrifice 40 years ago, said the president of the SJSU African American Faculty and Staff Association.

"There would have been several people shot for being in this march," Oscar Battle said. "Your houses would have been bombed last night or tonight because you were going to be in this march."

To commemorate Martin Luther King Jr. and the struggles he encountered, a Freedom March was held Saturday at the Martin Luther King Jr. Library, on South Fourth and San Fernando Streets, from noon until 2 p.m.

"It's not a black theme, it's an American theme," Battle said.

Battle hosted the march that had more than 100 people in attendance for what he said were three reasons.

"Number one, it gives people a chance to physically get together, various races and ethnic groups, to participate in raising issues in some of the things that King was concerned about," he said. "Secondly, the march gives people a chance to have your banners up and tell the world 'I'm for women's (liberation),' 'I'm for equality.' It gives the community a chance to see your issues."

"Third point about the march itself is that it gives (the speakers) a chance to be activated based upon what (they're) doing at the beginning of the speech,"

Medical marijuana debate continues

There was a call for action Jan. 27 at San Jose City Hall when advocates and critics of medicinal marijuana dispensaries assembled to encourage or dissuade an ordinance suggested by Councilman Pierluigi Oliverio that seeks to permit and tax medicinal marijuana dispensaries.

Marijuana for medical use is legal, according to the text of Proposition 215.

Proposition 215 passed with voter approval in 1996 and called for the legalization of the use of medicinal marijuana with 56 percent of the voters in favor. Santa Clara County supported this proposition with 64 percent. The California Legislature has since passed California Senate Bill 420, dealing with the implementation of medicinal marijuana, according to Oliverio's blog.

In October 2009, Oliverio submitted a memo to the city supporting an ordinance that allows the to city to issue a permit to tax medicinal marijuana dispensaries, according to Oliverio's blog.

Oliverio suggested that the city refer to and emulate the existing ordinances of surrounding cities with some exceptions that include the use of industrial land as the primary area for the cultivation of medicinal marijuana as well as a limit on the number of dispensaries within the city, according to the memo.

Oliverio also proposed a "cannabis business tax" with a minimum of 3 percent, a permit application fee of $10,000 and $1,000 fine for any unlawful sale of medicinal marijuana by patient or personnel for any other use outside of the intended, according to the memo.

'Civil Rights Resource Faire' enlightens locals of history

Groups interested in human rights gathered in the King Library on Saturday morning as part of the Civil Rights Resource Faire, part of the Martin Luther King Jr. Birthday Celebration.

Event coordinator Deborah Estreicher said the faire, which took place from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., was meant to give agencies for promotion of civil rights a place to share information with the general public.

"The faire is designed to let people know who to talk to if they have an issue (related to rights)," said Estreicher, who has organized the event for all four years of its existence.

Estreicher said she is also the coordinator for the library's Families For Literacy program, a part of the library's adult literacy advocate, called Partners in Reading.

The faire was coupled with a Freedom March, which began at noon, Saturday in the library lobby, Estreicher said.

"Having the Freedom March (here) is a wonderful springboard for bringing together groups interested in civil rights," said Judy Klikun, Partners in Reading manager.

Klikun said that the National Assessment of Adult Literacy counted 45 percent of Santa Clara County having "some sort of literacy issues."

Being able to read is a basic need for people to know they are getting their civil rights, she said.

Many other organizations were there to promote the value of giving information about civil rights to the public, Estreicher said.

"When people run into issues, they don't know they can do one thing or another," said Anne Henry, a volunteer with the American Civil Liberties Union.

Henry said the faire made it easier to tell

Car theft concerns campus police

Kristen Pearson
Staff Writer

The University Police Department has recorded an increase in vehicle thefts from the school garages this month, according to an e-mail from William Coker, interim chief of UPD.

“In January, there were three cars stolen,” said Sgt. John Laws of the UPD. “Two were stolen from the Fourth Street garage, and one was stolen from the 10th Street garage.”

Senior sociology major Ben Ingram said he’s not surprised that there are car thefts in the campus garages.

“Desperate times call for desperate measures,” he said. “My friend had his car stolen during winter session. Sucks for him.”

The cars stolen have been early model Honda vehicles and it is unknown whether the thefts are related, Coker stated in an e-mail.

Senior art major Brian Estill said he doesn’t know why the thefts might be happening, but it’s probably because the cars are easy to steal.

“Even as a non-driver, I feel bad that this is happening, even for the people whose cars are getting broken into,” he said.

Laws said the cars are usually older models.

“These cars are stolen more often because they tend to be easy to break into and easy to start,” he said.

Sophomore dance major Amanda Lacro said people think they can get away with stealing and don’t care about the consequences.

“I don’t feel safe, and it’s sad when you don’t feel safe where you live,” she said. “I’m scared, and I don’t want anything to happen.”

Lacro said she does a lot of things to protect her car and herself.

Talking on the phone when walking alone helps, she said.

“The escorts take too long when you call for them,” Lacro said. “They don’t get to you fast enough, so you could be standing there waiting for 15 to 20 minutes. A lot could happen in 15 to 20 minutes. It would be good to spread the word, and spread tips from the police. Knowledge is power.”

To prevent vehicle thefts from occurring, some tips are: always lock your vehicle and make sure valuables left inside are out of view, Coker stated in an e-mail.

Use vehicle theft deterrent devices like "the Club" or car alarms if you have them and be aware of your surroundings and report suspicious persons tampering with vehicles or loitering in the garages immediately, Coker stated.

In an emergency, call 911 from any campus phone or pay phone or pick up a Blue Light phone on all garage floors and program (408) 924-2222 into your cell phone to call UPD directly, Coker stated.

“Be on the lookout for anyone that doesn’t look like they belong in a car,” Laws said. “They would be driving into garages, getting out of their cars, and entering a different car.”

Ingram said he’d be willing to help the university police out by not committing crime on campus.

Estill said that a bystander informed his roommate that his car was being broken into.

The bystander, who was on his cell phone during the break-in, did nothing, Estill said.

“If I saw a car being stolen or broken into, I would at least call the police,” he said.

its name out, Gonzales said.

Some students apply to SJSU because of its location.

“I applied to San Jose State and Santa Clara University just cause they’re local and I was wanting to go to a local school that was higher than a J.C. (junior college) that I could actually stay home for,” said James Guinnane, a senior at Branham high school.

If anything, reasons why to apply to SJSU need to be promoted, but can be answered by many of its students, Gonzales said.

Job opportunities and name recognition in the Silicon Valley are good reasons why to attend SJSU, as well as being in an urban setting but not a huge city, she said.

“It’s local and central to peoples homes,” Gonzales said.

Jeannette Penyacsek, a senior child development major, said she didn’t apply to San Francisco State because it was too far from where she lived.

“(SJSU) was the closest one to my house,” Penyacsek said.

Marketing techniques would not have a made a difference to Penyacsek, she said, because SJSU was close to her home and she didn’t want to attend a school further away such as San Francisco.

Mitchell Williams, a senior business management major, thinks that marketing is a good tactic for universities to use.

"It's better once you get the little buzz in the kids ears cause I didn't have that, at least about (SJSU)," Williams said.

SJSU’s application system has a requirement to be considered for acceptance, including transfers, according to the pamphlet "Admissisions 101: How to apply to San Jose State University, and keep track of your admission.”

“I think they should market because they can draw more attention to the applicants which may encourage their decision so that they choose this university over others,” said Rahul Nadkarni, a freshman biological science major.

Nadkarni said he felt that the application process was a little tedious.

Guinnane said he thought that the application process to SJSU was easy.

“The hardest part was actually trying to pick out what college to go to,” Guinnane said.

“I was pretty late in applying so I kind of (applied) last minute. I had a friend in administrations,” Williams said. “Actually, I didn’t know anything about the school.”

For freshmen and transfers to be eligible to apply, there is criteria that must be met, according to the admissions pamphlet, which is available at the Student Service Center.

“There’s a process that the student applies, it comes in electronically,” Gonzales said. “There’s basically a blind review as long as long as the applica-

APPLICATION PROCESS

The actual application process has four steps, according to "Admission 101:"

Step 1. Apply to SJSU at www.csumentor.edu

Step 2. 5 – 7 business days after applying, go to <https://futurestudent.sjsu.edu> to receive information to gain access to MySJSU.

Step 3. Activate MySJSU at <http://my.sjsu.edu>

Step 4. Frequently check MySJSU for messages and notices.

After that, it is time to wait.

tion goes through to the process and the student meets the criteria set up in the system.”

Gonzales said the electronic nature of the application process means she does not physically look at the application, and that applicants will be accepted if they meet the CSU requirements.

“As long as the student is eligible based on CSU eligibility and they’re a California resident, students will be admitted,” Gonzales said.

Jennifer Halas, a guidance counselor at Branham high school, said she is satisfied with SJSU.

“For the most part I am impressed with SJSU and their MySJSU,” Halas stated in an e-mail. “I think it is helpful to students.”

The number of applications that a particular major accepts is what determines the acceptance number, Gonzales said.

“If they’re freshmen undeclared and they meet the eligibility, then they will get in,” Gonzales said.

“We have a name for ourselves,” Gonzales said. “We are San Jose State University, the oldest institution in the CSU.”

people where they can go to get help meeting with lawyers and legislators.

Archie Moore, San Jose NAACP representative and Vietnam War veteran, said his organization’s purpose at the faire was not only to give information to African-Americans.

“We’re trying to get people of other cultures involved,” Moore said. “We’d also like to start a branch on campus.”

Several immigration services were on hand, including the Services, Immigrants Rights and Education Network and U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

SIREN representative Francisco Alvarado said SIREN is a nonprofit organization that tries to get people "engaged in citizenship."

Alvarado said the best part of being at the faire was that one issue is everyone's issue.

Alvarado, who earned a degree in justice studies at SJSU in 2008, pointed to SIREN's immigration update text campaign and its postcard campaign to President Obama "to keep him accountable."

Volunteer Nancy Nguyen said the San Jose Peace and Justice Center focuses on stopping the war and fixing the budget crisis.

"I believe that because SJSU is a commuter school, (budget) awareness was not brought to everyone,” said Nguyen, a senior history major.

The center gained her attention by making a presentation in one of her classes, she said, which shows how important it is to spread awareness about the budget.

Other organizations there include the Arab American Cultural Center, Asian Law Alliance and the Citizen Commission for Human Rights.

Klikun said that this faire had a larger crowd than in previous years.

Poetry series showcase talented students

MOSAIC center aims to end violence

Hannah Keirns

The Market Cafe provided an intimate backdrop Thursday for students to showcase their creativity through poetry, short fiction, storytelling, improvisation and music for an audience of 60 during the MOSAIC WORD! Poetry Series.

“There is a lot of talent on this campus,” said Jose Lopez, MOSAIC Cross Cultural Center intern and a graduate student in philosophy, at the start of the event. “Tonight we want to create a safe space to set the condition for the possibility of artistic expression at SJSU.”

MOSAIC stands for Multicultural Opportunities and Student Awareness In Different Cultures, according to the center’s Web site.

Lopez said MOSAIC’s mission is to support and advocate for historically underrepresented groups through leadership opportunities and intentional programming focused on diversity, equity, social justice and cultural empowerment for the SJSU community.

“I brought the WORD! Poetry Series to MOSAIC three years ago,” Lopez said. “It’s an informal education for students who don’t learn about social and cultural differences.”

Thursday’s WORD! Poetry Series was headlined by 15 impromptu individuals who felt inspired to sign-up and perform at the event.

“Poetry is the device to better myself, to love myself freely,” said sophomore sociology major Sandra Huerta during her poetry performance. “My tongue is my brush, my thoughts are my colors and this is my Sistine Chapel.”

Huerta, who performed during MOSAIC’s WORD! Poetry Series last semester, said she would encourage her peers to “be the change you want to see.”

Fernando Marquez, a senior political science major, presented a timely and retrospective rap/spoken word piece titled “2009, a year in review,” where he “personalized the news” by highlighting historically and politically poignant events over celebrity gossip news.

When asked to pick his top 2009 events after his performance, Marquez spoke on the “overlooked” U.S. drone attacks on Pakistani villages and the appointment of President Barack Obama.

“I was at the inauguration,” Marquez said. “But public opinion has changed and views have toned down. Perhaps Obama didn’t deliver hope and everything he promised in his campaign. People should now take the time to go back and reflect. We will see what 2010 has in store.”

Thursday’s WORD! Poetry Series was co-hosted by Denisse Mendez who promoted SJSU students’ participation in the V-Day 2010 College Campaign through a benefit performance of “The Vagina Monologues” that is scheduled to premiere at Morris Dailey Auditorium on Thursday, March 4 at 8:00 p.m. and will continue on Friday, March 5 with two show times at 5:00 p.m. and 8:00 p.m.

At the Poetry Series, Mendez said that all proceeds of the student production will benefit women and children in the Democratic Republic of the Congo as well as local nonprofit organizations including the Young Women’s Christian Association and the Asian Women’s Home.

Mendez and her “vagina crew” of student actors proudly adorned a wall of the Market Cafe with ornamented speculums and shirts that celebrated the upcoming benefit performance and its cause.

The self-proclaimed troupe of “vagina warriors” also hosted a series of chocolate chip muffin-eating contests for enthusiastic and supportive audience members.

According to V-Day’s official Web site, “The Vagina Monologues” is an episodic play by performer and activist Eve Ensler that is based on interviews with more than 200 women and celebrates women’s sexuality and strength with humor and grace.

“Just as the WORD! Poetry Series gives students the opportunity to voice their opinion on campus, V-Day, and in particular, ‘The Vagina Monologues,’ gives a voice to women all around the world who are not heard,” said Fiza Najeeb, SJSU V-Day campaign coordinator and student intern at the Women’s Resource Center. “It wasn’t until I got involved with organizing V-Day that I learned in-depth about the sexual terrorism inflicted upon women, children and even men.”

V-Day is a global movement founded by Ensler to end violence (including rape, battery, incest, female genital mutilation and sexual slavery) against women and girls where the “V” in V-Day stands for victory, valentine and vagina, according to the V-Day Web site.

“There are two reasons to go to the benefit,” said senior psychology major Raisa Garcia. “One, to show your appreciation for women. And two, to break the statistics of violence against them by raising money toward organizations that are fighting for women.”

A promotional handbill at Thursday’s WORD! Poetry Series stated that tickets for “The Vagina Monologues” benefit performance will be available for purchase at $8 for students and $10 for general admission through the SJSU Event Center box office or via Ticketmaster.

“The event was off the hook,” said Vy Nguyen, a freshman social work major, who came to the WORD! Poetry Series Thursday night in support of her friend Erik Aguas. “In general, the night was about giving back. I believe in being out there and helping ... step up even if it’s not affecting you.”

The least interesting Sunday of the year

The Monday-morning quarterbackbacks should be in full stride today, and I can't see myself participating in some inane conversation about who did what in the big game yesterday.

I've grown more bored with American football for years now.

I can remember watching football during my youth and caring about players, stats and scores.

I was like that when it came to baseball season, too.

But I cared more for baseball, as I played it from age 7 to 16.

As I grew older, and I witnessed classmates become further and further entrenched in and defined by what football team they liked, I began to feel different about things.

My life wasn't defined by any sports team or player.

My life was defined by what band I was listening to, what concert I was planning on attending next and when I was going to jam with my band.

This is where football, and sports in general, began to leave my life and music became my world.

Don't get me wrong. I don't really follow sports, but that doesn't mean I don't care about how the A's or the Sharks are doing. I enjoy watching baseball and hockey with my friends and am open to going to a game if I have the time and money.

The exact opposite is true about football. I don't care how the Raiders or 49ers are doing. I've never been to a football game and don't plan on going to one anytime soon.

Kevin Hume
Staff Writer

The Super Bowl was something I used to enjoy watching.

The games were usually entertaining, and there are always those clever commercials that advertisers spend tons of money creating.

But now, all I see is a media shitstorm glorifying a game in which grown men get paid millions of dollars to entertain bovine America.

Working in a restaurant has helped to grow my disconnect with football.

Like most bars in restaurants, the TV in our bar is usually set to a game, or ESPN for SportsCenter.

I'll find myself at the bar waiting for a drink to be made for one of my tables.

Out of nowhere, one of the bar guests will try to ask me a question about some game that was on earlier.

What, because I'm a guy, I have to know what game and play you're talking about?

Sorry dude, I don't pay attention.

My masculinity isn't defined by watching sports.

I understand he's only trying to be nice and make small talk.

I could go out of my way and try to have a discussion with the guy and ask him what went on in the game.

But I like being different.

I'm glad I don't waste my time watching sports shows, with their smarmy hosts, hacks for announcers and former players or coaches providing analysis that anyone else could give.

This is where football, and sports in general, began to leave my life and music became my world.

I'm glad I don't live or die with a team's performance.

I'm glad I'm not always wishing it was football season.

I wouldn't say a lot in me has changed, but football has moved out of my life, possibly for good.

You know, it always seems like crappy American beer and football go hand in hand.

Give me a real beer and an amazing album, and I'm set.

My life is pretty good without football in it.

I'm sure I'm not the only guy who feels this way.

The Super Bowl should be a national holiday, damn it

Christmas, Easter and Thanksgiving are great holidays, but they're nothing compared to my favorite holiday.

Super Sunday.

On Super Bowl Sunday, I feel like a child on Christmas morning, opening my presents and expecting a shiny new green Power Ranger but ending up with a sweater that could make a porcupine itch.

That's because I have to deal with avoiding my work shift like it's H1N1.

I mean, why can't President Obama just issue an executive order and make it a national holiday?

It's not like Obama was pouring over health care bills yesterday. He probably had a "beer summit" in the Oval Office wondering when the Chicago Bears will win once again.

While I was working on Saturday, in the entertaining industry of retail, my co-workers and I couldn't stop talking about the big game.

We stopped talking about how much products cost and started talking about how expensive Super Bowl commercials are.

Driving through my neighborhood yesterday, the only people I saw outside were people on their way to someone's house for a Super Bowl party.

So why isn't the Super Bowl a national holiday?

Why can't I make my annual pilgrimage to a couch with a

Husain Sumra
Husain in the Membrane money into the economy.

Plus, because people watched all those fancy commercials, I'm sure millions of people would go purchase new services and products the day after.

We could call it "Pigskin Day."

Retailers would go crazy advertising special deals happening on the day after the Super Bowl.

Sure, that would mean more work for me, but it's for the greater good.

They could mention a tie-in with Valentine's Day, creating a smorgasbord of awesome, corporation-driven holidays ready to burn through the wallets of millions of people.

Oh, and there's the little thing about the actual game.

What if Obama were to invite foreign leaders over to the White House, or most likely Camp David, to celebrate?

I'd rather not read about Britain's Prime Minister Gordon Brown complaining yearly about American football being a barbaric sport, but it would be worth it if Obama and his boys decided to play a pickup game at the Washington Monument afterward.

The best part of all would be that I can relax and watch the Super Bowl every year without worrying about working.

For now, I'll just enjoy my leftover nachos.

"Husain in the Membrane," appears biweekly on Mondays. Husain Sumra is the Spartan Daily managing editor.

Bad news, bad books, bad business

It has occurred to me there is a comprehensive lack of customer service and general ethics in the capitalist nation that is the United States.

Crooked bankers? Ridiculous economic legislation? Please! I didn't need to head to Wall Street or Washington to seek scandal.

Allow me to illustrate a recent brush with poor ethical behavior at my neighborhood Barnes & Noble Booksellers.

On occasion, I've been known to have quiet Friday evenings to myself, and on said evenings I might make my way over to Barnes & Noble to buy the weekend issue of the USA Today — newspaper snobs roll eyes here. Barnes & Noble keeps this newspaper behind the counter.

So Friday night, I entered the store and went directly to the counter to make my purchase. When the sales lady retrieved the paper, I considered having a look around the store.

I mean, I had the time. "May I browse the store first?" I

Andrew Martinez
Staff Writer

asked as I was given the newspaper.

"Absolutely," said the female staff person with a smile.

When I went to pay for the newspaper, I was beckoned to pay at a different register than the previous one where I had picked up the paper.

When I handed the cashier the newspaper he asked, "Where did you get this?"

"From behind the counter," I replied.

Without skipping a beat, he walked directly over to the female staff person and, from what I could hear, reprimanded her for what I assume was allowing me to have the paper without first paying for it.

He returned, I paid and then proceeded to experience a succession of emotions.

I felt responsible for the lady's rebuke.

Then I felt embarrassed, and shortly after, I got angry.

One should never reprimand an employee in public.

The lady was in the process of providing me excellent customer service and apparently the manager did not value that. Instead, he chose to rob her of her dignity and victimize me, an observer and innocent party.

I don't use this term cavalierly — I was victimized. This was a scene I did not need to see and one I will remember in perpetuity.

The next morning, after I tried to enjoy my tainted newspaper, I decided to voice my dissatisfaction in a heated e-mail to the Barnes & Noble customer service Web site. I relayed that not only had they ruined my consumer experience, but they also ruined my USA Today newspaper — again, newspaper snobs laugh here.

I told them that what we have here is unprofitable behavior. These are lean times for consumers as well as businesses. Millions of Americans are unemployed and great companies are struggling. The working and middle classes are returning to meeting their basic needs, and these needs don't include being subjected to unprofessional business behavior.

With the e-reader making progress, it will not do good for the mammoth book retailer to continue this demonstration in poor ethics.

Though my boycott of this particular Barnes & Noble may be unnoticed, I hope my call for better treatment of staff and patrons will be received.

Remember, even as students we are consumers.

Voicing your dissatisfaction is as important to our floundering university as it was to my encounter with Barnes & Noble.

Letter to the Editor

This letter is a response to 'Skipping the pill' that appeared on Jan. 28.

I really enjoyed Michelle Gachet's honesty with her piece on the contraceptive pill. Publishing such personal stories makes The Spartan Daily an interesting read for the students.

Many females are too embarrassed to reveal the symptoms they feel as a result of taking the pill and sadly, some do not even know that these symptoms can be attributed to this form of birth control.

I would have liked Gachet to have explored other options, besides the contraceptive pill, for those interested in changing their current methods or starting a method of birth control. Thank you.
