REPORT OF THE RESULTS OF SJSU VETERANS SURVEY

Dr. Anne Demers and Dr. Richard Francisco have conducted a survey of SJSU student veterans. Eighty-seven respondents completed the survey, all branches of the military were represented, and 38% of participants OIF or OEF war veterans.

Less than 50% of surveyed student veterans had been screened for PTSD or traumatic brain injury (TBI). Of those screened, 36% were diagnosed with PTSD, and all of them reported that they are receiving treatment. None of the veterans had been diagnosed with TBI. Almost 40% of veterans had no knowledge about counseling services available to them at SJSU; 45% of this group had served in OIF or OEF.

Queried about how welcome they feel at SJSU, 65% feel completely welcome, 35% feel somewhat welcome, and 10% do not feel welcome at all. Feelings of being welcome on campus were primarily related to supportive interactions with faculty, staff, and students. Factors included faculty who respected veterans’ experiences, acceptance by non-veteran students, positive interactions with the VA Benefits Coordinator, and the freedom to remain anonymous when desired.

Veterans attributed not feeling welcome to institutional factors and negative interpersonal interactions. These included frustration with registration and financial aid (for those without benefits), lack of acceptance of military credits, and inability to enroll in needed courses in a timely manner.

Encounters with both faculty and students were often stressful. Veterans reported a lack of understanding on the part of faculty that many veterans are dealing with psychological issues and life transition stressors. They also found an unwillingness of some faculty to entertain diverse perspectives in class discussions. Veterans were frustrated by interactions with students perceived as either judgmental and/or uninformed about the military and veterans.

Approximately 60% reported that they had overcome their challenges in transitioning to student life, citing support from the VA Benefits Coordinator; other veteran students; and from family, significant others, and peers, as well as determination as most helpful. Barriers to successful transition were similar to factors that prevented a sense of feeling welcome at SJSU, but some also identified emotional and psychological issues: the loss of a sense of purpose, low motivation and energy.

Veterans identified social support and institutional services that would assist them in transitioning to both university and civilian life. In the area of social support, veterans suggested outreach and peer support groups that could provide occasions to process their experiences, and social gatherings that promote extracurricular activities and develop supportive relationships.

Suggestions for better institutional support included university orientations specific to veterans where they could learn about university systems, procedures, and support services; extended services available at night, e.g., tutoring; and training staff/faculty/administrators to be more sensitive to veterans’ issues and challenges. In addition to the aforementioned suggestions, we would recommend that all OIF/OEF veterans be encouraged to obtain screening for PTSD and TBI.
